Below the heading is the text "We all have a role in helping meet the needs of victims" and a blue button labeled "Enroll for free".

In The Little Book of Restorative Justice, Howard Zehr notes that victims' needs for such things as information, vindication, restitution, and empowerment may not be fully met through the mainstream justice system. Mounting research demonstrates that many who participate in Restorative Justice (RJ) feel their needs were met, including victims who found that RJ offered them answers, a voice, and a chance to participate meaningfully in a justice response to their victimization.

Our project builds upon a previous symposium (Working with Trauma, 2013) and gathering (Restorative Justice Listening Project, 2017), both in Greater Vancouver, that involved RJ and victim services (VS) practitioners in BC coming together to share, listen, and brainstorm about working together to support victims. We want to continue the conversation, critical thinking, and skill-building around victim-sensitive practice and RJ application.

This course has four modules, which we anticipate taking you approximately one hour to complete. You can go at your own pace and do not need to complete them all at once. You may begin the course as of
